An Appeal

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC, oldest of all the schools devoted to musical education in this country, has been compelled to issue a public appeal for funds. Hitherto the Academy has been largely supported by private subscriptions and donations; throughout a century of activity the nation at large has never been asked for help. But the growing interest in native music, and the constant increase in the numbers of those who seek admission to the Academy, have made the provision of a small theatre, wherein British Opera may be adequately studied and performed, a matter of urgent necessity.

The Academy itself and its patrons have subscribed to the full extent of their resources, but a balance still remains outstanding for which your contributions are asked. This balance amounts to £17,000.

No doubt the calls upon your generosity are many. Yet the just claims of British music, so long neglected by the world, cannot now be denied. There is a patriotism in Art, and I am confident that no one who loves music—and who does not?—will refuse the slight self-sacrifice that may be the price of his help.
